The Etudes which were composed earlier than those of Chopin were intended solely to supply needed exercise in preparation for the playing of certain pieces. The method then in vogue entailed merely the taking of some difficult technical passages, perhaps from some particular work, and building upon it a series of passages of progressive difficulty. In this way the student was able more quickly to master a piece which abounded in this particular difficulty. These purely utilitarian studies were often made more interesting to the student by confining them within some musical form, such as the Song Form or the Rondo, though in only a very few instances were such studies of any musical value, except as preparatory technical studies. There were, of course, in such Etudes few opportunities for the exercise of any other element of musicianship than the...
